Typically only an authorized rep of a company is allowed to maintain/work on a system. So they could try to hide behind that language to dump your workmanship warranty... with that said if you've taken all reasonable and customary steps to get in touch with them and they are simply non responsive you would have good grounds to push back on that from a legal perspective.

At the end of the year I get a "true up" bill from my power company either charging me for the power I used over the year or send me a check (or bill credits) for the excess power I sent to the grid. From what I understand is I have a better deal than most in that all the power generated is mine where others just get the power they generate but ...
